Summaries of Articles Accepted for Publication

Policing Queer Sexuality: A review of Anna Lvovsky's book, VICE PATROL, extending Professor Lvovsky's analysis of how police conceptualized their expertise on matters of queer sexuality to novel contexts: sexual content moderation online and misinformation in constitutional litigation.

Manufactured Uncertainty in Constitutional Litigation: Identifies patterns in fact-intensive constitutional litigation, from LGBTQ+ rights to abortion, demonstrating that judicial recasting of the tiers of scrutiny tests contributes to the legitimization and laundering of misinformation through law, harming marginalized populations as a result.

Gender Data and the Automated Administrative State: This Article argues that law mandates, fosters, and incentivizes a certain kind of automation that binarizes gender data, harming gender diverse populations. It challenges the two major strands of scholarship on the automated state: one suggesting that automation and its harms arise in a legal void and one focused on legal responses to automation. Through a case study of how the law creates binary gender data pathways throughout the government's data ecosystem, this Article makes us rethink the administrative state's reliance on discretion, expertise, and assumptions about the value of data.

Articles Under Consideration

The Gender Box: Heterogeneity and Inclusivity in State Collection of Sex and Gender Data (under consideration, peer review): This Article is a quantitative analysis of sex/gender questions on a novel data set of 7000+ state government forms. Using computational methods, I scraped over 50,000 publicly available documents from websites of all 50 states and the District of Columbia and coded for each element of forms' gender questions. Using both manual/axial coding methods and statistical analysis, I demonstrate the high levels of chaos and inconsistencies among gender boxes, whether across states, within states, within departments, within programs, and even within the same form.

Opening the Gender Box (under consideration, peer review): Based on over 100 FOIA requests as well as qualitative interviews with front-line workers involved in form design, this Article challenges current scholarship suggesting that sex/gender data collection practices are products of transphobia, the formal law, or agency missions. Rather, I demonstrate that the gender box is chaotic and inconsistent because the social pressures affecting front-line, street-level bureaucratic work are chaotic and inconsistent. This is the first study of state sex and gender data collection to learn from the perspectives of those responsible for putting the law into practice.
